ISIS recruit child soldiers, force marriages on young women in Afghanistan

September 17, 2015

The loyalists of the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) terrorist group are recruiting child soldiers and force marriages on young women and girls in eastern Nangarhar province of Afghanistan, it has been reported.

According to the local tribal elders the affiliates of the terror group have also executed hundreds of people including civilians amid ongoing violence in parts of Nangarhar province where brutal clash also continue between the ISIS and Taliban militants.

Haji Azim Khan, a tribal elder in Achin district, said the terror group has also started forced recruitment of young men and children to fight for the group.

The ISIS loyalists were also going from house to house to identify young women and girls and forcing marriages on them, Khan told The Telegraph, adding that anyone who had previously worked with the government was considered a spy and had been executed.

Frustrated with the growing atrocities of the terror group, the district governor of Achin has called for a public uprising against the loyalists of the terror group.

“Everyone who has a gun, a sword, anything, should fight these cruel people,” Muhahid said, warning that the district was badly suffering due to the growing insurgency activities of the terror group.

This comes as the Speaker of the Upper House of the Parliament – Meshrano Jirga, Fazal Hdi Muslimyar called on First Vice President Gen. Abdul Rashid Dostum to lead an operation against the loyalists of the terror group in eastern Nangarhar province, similarly as he led operations in northern provinces.

Speaking during a session of Meshrano Jirga on Sunday, Muslimyar expressed concerns regarding the deteriorating security situation of Nangarhar and growing activities by Daesh affiliates in this province.

Criticizing the government’s lack of attention on deteriorating situation of Nangarhar, Muslimyar called for an immediate action to rescue the residents of this province.
