Education after the genocide in Gaza (RENÁN VEGA CANTOR) Free book

In this essay, the Colombian historian outlines what could and should be the orientations of l@s educador@s critic@s driven by a humanist ethic.

The title of this text paraphrases Education after Auschwitz, the title of a radio talk given by the German philosopher Theodor Adorno in 1966 and later published in book format, in the first lines of which he says: "The demand that Auschwitz not be repeated is the first of all in education. To such an extent does it precede any other that I do not think I should or can substantiate it. I can't understand why so little attention has been devoted to this day. To substantiate it would be somewhat monstrous in the face of the monstrosity of what happened. [...]. Any debate about ideals of education is vain and indifferent compared to this one: that Auschwitz should not be repeated. It was barbarism, against which all education is directed." Today we are faced with the repetition of Israel's genocidal barbarity against the Palestinian people. In this essay, the Colombian historian outlines what could and should be the orientations of l@s educador@s crític@s driven by a humanist ethic.
