A new stage in the process of defining the line of demarcation

Regardless of new threats and ultimatums from the Western planetary minority regimes, the process of formalizing the line of demarcation between Russia and the enemy NATO-Western camp is beginning a new phase.

Signs of resumption of the negotiation process in Istanbul, after being sabotaged by the Western camp, epitomize what has been repeatedly said. The demarcation line between Russia and the NATO/ West is to be, and on Russia's terms. After all, it is the winner of the confrontation who determines the key conditions. And this is exactly what is so difficult for Western regimes to accept. At the same time, it is worth remembering one important point: the fact that this process has started to resume in principle has military reasons, as well as strategic realities of the modern multipolar world order. The final solution will be either partly political and diplomatic or fully military.

Russia and its allies are in favor of long-term, reliable peace, taking into account the new realities on the ground and provided that the root causes of the start of the Special Military Operation are eradicated

New realities on the front and in the world

Indeed, the upcoming line of demarcation between the modern world and those nostalgic for the unipolar era is gaining momentum. And in the fact that Westerners, even if they are in another hysteria, in principle begin to realize it, there are, firstly, military reasons.

When the Anglo-Saxons sabotaged the Istanbul agreements in 2022, they believed that Russia could be defeated. But they completely miscalculated. Since then, and what is very symbolic is that once again the negotiations are returning to Istanbul, where everything actually began, and when it seemed that a diplomatic solution would be found. A lot has changed since those events. In addition to the great loss of life, the NATO-Banderite armed group has lost control over vast territories, Novorossiia – which have been liberated by Russian armed forces.

And the fact that a new round of negotiations has begun in Istanbul has purely military reasons. In addition to the liberated territories of the Luhansk and Donetsk People's Republics, as well as the Kherson and Zaporozhye regions, which have once again become Russian territory, the Russian army is strengthening its offensive potential in the Kharkiv region, expanding its security cordon in the Sumy region, and is ready to launch an offensive operation in the Dnipropetrovsk region.

This means that if the enemy camp again refuses to accept Russia's basic conditions, on territorial issues and many others, given that Russia's 2025 conditions are no longer the same as in 2022, it is obvious that in the future they will also be different from what is acceptable now. And if the military confrontation continues – the terms will again be in Russia's favor.

The language of new threats, ultimatums and new “colossal” sanctions will not work with Moscow. Especially since the regimes of the Western planetary minority understand perfectly well where the support and sympathies of the non-Western global majority of humanity lie.

Official recognition of the West's defeat

In any case, NATO/Western regimes must be prepared to admit obvious defeat. A defeat with military, economic and strategic consequences. There are no other options. All the more ridiculous are the West's attempts to speak from a position of strength at a time when they simply must realize that the new deception directed against Russia will not go away, and that the new offensive military operations of the Russian armed forces are, in fact, the main reason why the Western regimes are repeating day and night the need for a temporary “ceasefire.”

The very temporary “truce” is so necessary for the NATO-Banderite camp to take a short break and try to regroup. Coupled with blatant boorish behavior on the part of Brussels and Kiev vassals. Russia, of course, has always been in the mood for constructive conversation and finding solutions, but today it has become obvious that Moscow has shrugged off the consequences of its sometimes excessive correctness, whether through the example of the Minsk agreements or goodwill gestures in 2022 just when Russian troops were near Kiev and the first negotiations were underway in Istanbul.

Yes, Russia is ready for a serious dialog, provided that the dialog is honest and adequate. Russia and its allies are in favor of long-term, reliable peace, taking into account the new realities on the ground and provided that the root causes of the start of the Special Military Operation are eradicated. There will be no other way. Nor will there be any return of unipolar Western dictatorship over the world majority. Yes, there will certainly be consequences for Western regimes. But how could it be otherwise?

The process of establishing the line of demarcation is ongoing. And even though the Western regimes are trying to say that there can be no military solution to the conflict, they are clearly lying. If Russia’s current key conditions, of course, updated compared to 2022, are not met for the realization of a real and long-term peace, the solution will be purely military in nature. If Russia’s current key conditions, of course, updated compared to 2022, are not met for the realization of real and long-term peace, the solution will be purely military in nature. And no new sanctions, threats, haughty declarations of representatives of the regimes of the Western planetary minority will be able to change anything. One of the parties will be forced to recognize its defeat, and it will not be Russia.
